Editorial Review

From the Inside Flap

As a consequence of the credit crunch, the financial services industry, most notably banking, is undergoing tumultuous change--a period of transformation that is unprecedented in the sector's history and will likely not be experienced again for a lifetime, at least. Responding to intense public, government, regulatory and shareholder pressure, the sector is reorganizing itself so that performance is more transparent and accountable, risk management disciplines are more robust and that sustainable long-term financial return is seen as being as important as short-term profit.

This book by Naresh Makhijani and James Creelman describes how financial services organizations throughout Asia as well as other regions are tackling these and other challenges through the implementation of the Balanced Scorecard: the world's most popular strategy management framework that balances financial with non-financial performance and short-term requirements with long-term objectives, among many other benefits.

Based on in-depth case study material, Creating a Balanced Scorecard for a Financial Services Organization provides a detailed step-by-step practical template for Balanced Scorecard design and implementation, explaining how integrate risk management with strategy management through the Balanced Scorecard and how to link operational and strategy management. The book also clearly explains how to build a suite scorecards from corporate through business unit, function and even individual employee levels and how to make strategy "everyone's everyday job."

The financial services sector is on a journey of extraordinary change. Creating a Balanced Scorecard for a Financial Services Organization provides a roadmap for charting a course through what will be extraordinary times.
