Editorial Review

Review

In five essays, accounting and business scholars from the US and Europe explore environmental and sustainable accounting. They discuss the relationship between corporate social responsibility performance and corporate financial performance in Chinese firms; the link between management control systems and sustainability; whether organizations' environmental performance ranked by Newsweek in its annual Green Ranking issue is consistent with a measure of hazardous wastes from firms that produce them; the link between corporate governance and environmental performance; and the impact of the Securities and Exchange Commission interpretive release on climate change on companies.
